Speed Limit Reductions

Question No: 2022/1654

Neil Garratt

In February 2022 I asked question 2022/0819 about the need to review bus timetables when speed limits are reduced, to avoid creating a safety issue by putting undue pressure on bus drivers to achieve a timetable that can no longer be met safely or legally.

In response, you claimed that this is not necessary because lowering speed limits does not slow buses down. In my view, your answer was not just factually wrong and mathematically ignorant, it was embarrassing. Using the following example, could you walk me through your thinking?

Suppose a bus route contains, along its entire length, cumulatively one mile of driving at 30mph. That mile will take 2 minutes. If the speed limit is reduced to 20mph over that mile, it will now take 3 minutes. This is true regardless of the bus's average speed over the whole route.

The baseline assumption must therefore be that this route will now take one minute longer.

Given that you believe the total route will not take longer, can you explain how you believe the driver can make back this minute?
