London is already over populated and overdeveloped. Trying to accommodate up to 10.8 million and more by 2041 is like trying to fill a pint into a half pint mug. The plan is only pushing boundaries where suburbs become an extension of the central city and are ruined by ugly high rise housing developments causing overcrowding and even more pressure on our NHS system and utilities. When is a city saturated? When does expansion end? I have lived in London for over 45 years and now find it overpopulated, more polluted and less safe than it was

The real problem is too many people are allowed to enter the UK. We are only a small country cramming people in then finding accommodation is limited. Austria's total population is less than London - doesn't that tell us something??

Too much diversity - this has caused unrest, disruption and increased crime to our city

Once again - London is overpopulated to the extent that services such as NHS is at breaking point and public transport can't adequately cope with the demands in central London now. Extending tube/train lines just provides a commute from further out of London, bringing more people from outer areas that will exacerbate the central city commute. How will it cope with an extra 70,000 a year? I'm unconvinced

How can green space be increased if you are constantly providing housing developments for an ever expanding population? Ugly high rise buildings? Didn't we learn anything from the 1960's and it's high rise accomodation failure?

There is no proof that Brexit will put pressure on our economy in the long term
