Your message

Dear Mayor Sadiq Khan,

I, Jeferson Branco, Brazilian citizen and architecture student currently on my last semester of college, am sending you this message about a subject I think we both care about: Gender-neutral public toilets. I just saw on the news your concern about the importance of expanding the numbers of it in London, and there is some contribution of mine that may be interesting for your plans.

Sooner this year I was participating on a national architecture contest about toilets design and it ended up very well. I won on my category which was "public toilets for the underground" where my proposal was a Gender-neutral public toilet, and further of that, I also won the general prize of the night. On my view, this was way more a victory for my nation then just for me. Brazil is unfortunately the country that kills the most trans-people per year.

But the most interesting part of the project is that it was inspired by the great British designer: Henry Charles Beck. Beck on his days, revolutionized the way of how people uses the underground until nowadays with his diagram. Before that, it was hard for a lot of people to understand the way the underground works and with his proposed diagram, he had made possible for everyone to utilize it. What on my view, is just the same of what we are trying to do with the toilets today. Simplifying the use of it and making a way of how everybody can use it safely, comfortably and free of any prejudice.

Below you will find a link to my online portfolio where you can take a look at the project if it's of your interest.

Thank you for your prompt attention.

Best regards,

Jeferson Branco
