Before the mayor does anything, it would be a prudent measure to ensure that there is sufficient good public services in the whole of the proposed area, not just the most populated parts. For example in the part of Greater London Kent where I live, public transport is wholly inadequate and often non-existent and bearing in mind that we have many elderly and disabled people who are not car drivers and reliant on public transport any changes need to be well thought out before being implemented. In this part of the world cars are an essential because of the lack of thought out public transport.
