These comments are about the general direction of travel and aims of the Draft London Plan and are intentionally brief and do not reference specific policies.

International thinking is using terms like living laboratories, and is aiming to bring together inclusion, sustainability, resilience, participation and equality.

I think a stronger introduction and summary is urgently needed that continually reinforces the joined up and cross cutting nature of all the specific policies.

Together with this the specific policies must be audited and written to show how they directly assist the overall aims of the plan.

I think many of the specific policy aims are severely weakened because they do not clearly continually reinforce these cross cutting "holistic " liminal issues.

An example is play. If a geographical area is carefully planned to allow children to play in the streets outside their homes this requires very significant traffic management measures.

I am not saying anything new, I understand Humboldt and Darwin thought like this .

I would be pleased if the suggestions in this article were included in the London Plan consultation.

I would also request that anyone commissioning public seating ensures it is to excellent standards of inclusion.
