I would like to ensure a health giving environment for all.

In order to ensure this people need space, light and fresh air as well as the individual rights to food, fitful work and housing.

There are so many studies pertaining to overcrowding that show animals will eat other to fight for their space. When their 'space' is not invaded then they can leave harmoniously.

Noticably Londoners are viaing for position on transport, pavement walking space, road space already as an example without necessarily considering the needs of those that require the same space. The animal world studies are reflecting already in the people where overcrowding is present already.

If we are looking for a future of dog eat dog then the plan looks amazing. However, if we want to nurture and respect our fellow human beings and create an environment that will generate happiness then increasing density will be detrimental to the human race.

Studies have been done to show that 'community' reduces the cost to services. Community evolves into engendering selfless caring by a small group of people. This group grow to be self-sufficient in a spaced geographical patch where each member of community, including the elderly contribute to the whole. Density does not allow community to grow, thus individuation of caring services via social services needs to be budgetted.
