I think that a great city needs to offer opportunity to all it's citizens.

This new plan seems to address this need.

It may also help to refocus seeing property as a home, not just an investment.

I also have a question: on the train into Waterloo, around Nine Elms and Vauxhall, I see blocks of flats, finished and unfinished, and I see the same thing in other parts of London: are these affordable? Are they occupied? I have read that a lot of these are iowned by investors, and if they are indeed empty that seems to be crying shame.
