Introduction

The Mayor of London’s Fourth Plinth Commission is now one of the most highly regarded contemporary public art programmes in the world. The programme has achieved significant national and international attention for its commitment to commissioning the very best contemporary art in one of the world’s most visited tourist destinations – Trafalgar Square, London. Approximately 4,000 people an hour go past the square and thousands more spend time in it every day.

Since 1999 a series of temporary artworks have been commissioned specifically for this prestigious location in the heart of London. The artworks have always been provocative and have presented challenging propositions for the role of contemporary art in the centre of our cities.

Each artwork generates high levels of discussion, amongst art professionals and members of the public alike. Discussions are about the climate in which the works are being commissioned, the square in which they are located and the city they come to represent over the period of their exhibition.

Background of the programme

The Fourth Plinth, located in the north-west corner of Trafalgar Square, was designed by Sir Charles Barry and built in 1841 to display an equestrian statue. Due to insufficient funds the plinth was left empty and remained so until 1998 when The Royal Society for the Encouragement of Arts, Manufactures and Commerce (RSA) commissioned a series of three works to be temporarily displayed there.

First commissions

In organising these commissions the RSA hoped to refocus attention on the empty plinth, to raise awareness of public art and to help resolve the plinth’s long term future. The sculptures commissioned by the RSA were Ecce Homo (1999) by Mark Wallinger, Regardless of History (2000) by Bill Woodrow, and Monument (2001) by Rachel Whiteread. Prior to the RSA’s initiative the plinth attracted little or no attention, but the success of the commissions was indicated by the level of press and media attention, which continues today.

Context

Trafalgar Square has become a symbolic centre for London; a social and historic focus reflecting London’s diversity, while maintaining its role as a place of protest and dissent, celebration and informal gathering.

It is a site for cultural and community based events as well as a popular destination for the capitals’ many visitors.

The Fourth Plinth Commissioning Programme is an important aspect of the Mayor’s vision for Trafalgar Square and is accompanied by a significant London-wide Public Programme, including the popular Fourth Plinth Schools Awards.

The aim of the project is to:

Commission a series of outstanding works of art of the highest quality.

Act as a focal point for a wider public debate on public art, urban design and civic space in London.

Inspire other areas within London to support and initiate commissions of contemporary art and to raise awareness of existing public art.

Promote Trafalgar Square as a public space for cultural and social engagement.

The work should be

Contemporary and site-specific: Referring/responding to the conceptual, historical or formal framework of the Square as the central public space of London; a public space with both national and international significance.

Appropriate: Trafalgar Square contains an important collection of sculptures ranging over three centuries. However, while the plinth was designed for an equestrian bronze, the commission doesn’t necessarily need to be a work of object-based sculpture.

Please note:

The Fourth Plinth is a listed structure and mountings for the work must not cause damage to the existing fabric.

Although the commission will only be in place on the plinth for up to 24 months, it is anticipated that it will be sold or publicly displayed after this period.

The object must be made of sufficiently robust materials to withstand open exhibition for the initial exhibition period and beyond in extremes of temperature, direct sunlight, heavy rain, bird deposits, traffic emissions and possible human interference.

Fixtures
A steel attachment frame has been fixed to the top surface of the plinth. The sculpture can be bolted to the steel frame halfen channel inserts, which provide nominal lateral restraint. Sculpture stability is provided by gravity only.

Load-bearing capacity
No general assessment of the load-bearing capacity of the plinth has been carried out, but previous sculptures provide an indication: Rachel Whiteread’s sculpture weighed approximately 10,500 kg, Bill Woodrow’s 8,500 kg and Marc Quinn’s weighed approximately 13 tonnes.

Power supply
There is a single phase 16 amp power source currently available at the top of the plinth, further details available on request.

Lighting
There are two spotlights available to illuminate the work – one from the National Gallery and the other from Canada House – both neighbours of Trafalgar Square.
Appendix: Further background and context

Trafalgar Square lies at the heart of London bringing together the very different experiences of Buckingham Palace, the world famous shopping streets of the West End, the vibrant and night-time life of Leicester Square and Soho, the bookshops and theatres of Charing Cross Road, the street life of Covent Garden, Charing Cross Railway Station (one of the busiest stations in the metropolis) and the Houses of Parliament.

The redesign of Trafalgar Square by Foster and Partners in 2003 allowed the opportunity to easily enter the Square and enjoy its remarkable location and surroundings. The key change to the Square was the pedestrianisation of the north side and the creation of a central staircase through the north wall, directly linking the National Gallery to the square for the first time.

As a result Trafalgar Square has become a symbolic centre for London; a social and historic space reflecting London’s diversity, while maintaining its role as a place of protest and dissent, celebration and informal gathering. It is a site for cultural and community based events whilst also a popular destination for the capitals’ many visitors.

In 1999 responsibility for Trafalgar Square was transferred to the Mayor of London and the Greater London Authority. The Fourth Plinth Programme is integral to the Mayor’s vision for Trafalgar Square and is a focal point for social and cultural activity in the capital.
Following the RSA programme of sculpture and the renewed interest in the plinth, the Government asked Sir John Mortimer QC to set up an independent committee to consider its future. Having examined the public response to the RSA programme and consulted with a wide range of people, the committee unanimously recommended that the plinth should continue to be used for an ongoing series of temporary works of art commissioned from leading national and international artists.

Mayor Ken Livingstone endorsed this recommendation when he took on responsibility for Trafalgar Square in 1999 and a panel of specialist advisors (the Fourth Plinth Commissioning Group) was appointed to guide and monitor a programme of contemporary art commissions.

On 15 September 2005, the first commission, ‘Alison Lapper Pregnant’ by Marc Quinn was installed on the Fourth Plinth. It was tremendously successful, capturing the public interest as well as global media attention. Thomas Schütte’s, ‘Model for a Hotel’ followed in November 2007 and then in 2009 Antony Gormley’s; ‘One and Other’ was unveiled. Yinka Shonibare MBE’s, ‘Nelson’s Ship in a Bottle’ was revealed in May 2010 and was recently de-installed to make room for the newest commission, ‘Powerless Structures, Fig. 101’ by Elmgreen & Dragset. Katharina Fritsch’s, ‘Hahn / Cock’ was unveiled in 2013 and the 10th commission, Hans Haacke’s ‘Gift Horse’ has been in situ since March 2015.
